

If the world were the same for everyone, after several dozen generations life would have become a nightmare for everybody.

So how should we understand the paradoxical statement that the world is not the same for everyone? We all live in the same world comprised of the material realization of alternative life lines and yet every person experiences a different possible alternative.

On the surface of things there are obvious differences in people's fate. Some are rich, some are poor; some are successful and some are struggling; some are lucky and some unlucky.

We all have our own personal reality within the common world we live in. It seems quite straightforward, just as there are rich and poor neighbourhoods in a single town. The script, role and the scenery differ in different manifestations of reality. The difference in scenery is harder to track.

One person looks at the world from the window of their luxurious car whilst another peeks at it from inside a rubbish container. One person enjoys the party whilst another is consumed in thought about their problems. One sees a group of happy youths, another at a gang of hooligans.

They are all looking at the same things but the images they perceive differ as black and white film differs from colour. Every individual is attuned to their own sector in the alternatives space and so everyone lives in their own personal world.

All these worlds exist in layers that converge one on top of the other forming what we understand to be the space/time we live in. It might be difficult to imagine but no one layer can be separated from another. Every individual creates their own reality and that reality intersects and interacts with the rest of the world around us.

The phenomenon of being drawn further towards the vortex can be described as an induced transition to a life line where the adherent becomes the victim of a destructive pendulum.

So the above should make it clear to us that how we perceive and react to the life line we are manifesting in the present moment will either attract or repel us from our intended goal.

This is very fundamental to our wellbeing, because if we are not awake/aware and get pulled/hooked into focusing on not intended or desirable situations we will nevertheless end up transferring to the proximity of those unwanted life track and so gaining first-hand experience. Remember Outer Intention does not recognise the (NO/NOT/DON'T). Focusing or being attracted to something that creates a feeling-reaction will attract the object focused upon.

That is what Vadim Zeland calls Induced Transition.
